A Trip Over the Chesapeake and Ohio health, some sixteen years old, was taken from school and mounted on rather a diminutive pony; with a huge pair of saddle bags, and sent to the mountains of Virginia, and particularly to the White Sulphur Springs, for the restoration of his health. The meeting was opened with singing, fol-These were primitive days. After a lapse of fortysix years, not having to go to the fountains of health any more, we concluded to join the excursion party coming out of Richmond on the 9th instant and see the old White Sulphur once more, and all the great scenery between there and Huntington which we had heard so much of. The Chesapeake and Ohio is a superb road and in splendid condition, and carried us on with a smoothness and swiftness truly delightful. As we approached the mountains Nature's panoramic views increased in beauty and grandeur, scenes so eminently calculated to waken up the latent poetry of one's soul should be have any. Between Charlottesville and the White

A small and shallow river winds its tortuous course for sixty-odd miles between two unbroken chains of lofty mountains, with their base on each side of the water's edge, and many immense proportions; while some from tain Pease master, arrived here yesterday their great attitudes bad the appearance of those old castles we dream of while reading of the days of knight-errantry, and the mind wearies in its effort to take in such continuous grandeur. But more wondrous than all was to see that long train of twenty conches hitched to a single engine gliding along its serpentine track. It was a hard task to the tron horse, but he was well up to his work. He would snort and put, he was doing. And the road! Who The prices we guarantee to be as low as the same | would ever have dreamed that man would have attempted to build a railroad through such a country? Mountain and gulches filled up with the debris for the track to pass on. And the road when completed, we would have supposed, there would have been but few bold enough to travel over it, so eminently bazardous in appearance to one's life. Ere we left home we were somewhat inclined to adopt Darwin's theory of the origin of man, but when we saw the wonderous engineering skill it took to construct that railroad truck when we saw that long train moving along with grace and ease, and remembered that mere vapor was doing it all, the work of more than a thousand horses; when we saw small strings of wire stretched along from pole to pole and remembered that the lightning of heaven was then and there flashing man's thoughts from point to point regardless of distance, we said to ourselves, No; Mr. Darwin is wrong; the brains that conceived and the skill that executed such wonders could never have been evolved from that of a monkey.
